For example, today I bought BDR at $2.11 and it quickly rose to $3.80. Ignoring the fact that the trading on it was suspended for a few hours, are there any indicators that would've shown it would go $3+? I sold at $2.25 and I'm not complaining - profit is profit. But me finding the stock and buying it were based off of technical reasoning.

Daytrading: Information for your everyday trader

Large number of trades – Scalpers usually take a very high number of trades during a day. It's not uncommon to take dozens of trades on short-term timeframes if your trading system gives you the green light. A large number of trades also means a higher profit potential, given your analysis is correct and you close your trades in profit.

Take profit target, average the last 3 days range and use that as your profit targets. For example, if day 1 daily candle range (high-low) was 100 pips, day two had 150 pips and day 3 had 90 pips, then the average of these three days would be 113 pips. So 113 pips should be set as your take profit target.
